FINISH THAT DISH

The innovative cooking contest “Finish That Dish” sets eight chefs in four teams against each other in a battle that tests their ability to understand how their teammates’ think without communication between them. They may complete the task masterfully or fail disastrously in this entertaining culinary relay race.

Speed and planning are everything in this unique game, as the first four cooks launch into their challenge, slicing, dicing, seasoning, and hoping to start sauteing before the buzzer rings. Once it does, the drama steams up as they must drop their knives and exit the kitchen, leaving their teammates to complete the dishes. Meanwhile, their four cooking partners have been waiting in an isolation area, having seen and heard nothing of what has been happening on stage. When the bell rings they immediately exit their booths and race to their cooking station to see what their partner has already prepared.

The meat is already in the fryer and the vegetables are sizzling, but what does the second chef do now? They must quickly figure out what their teammate was preparing and “Finish That Dish.” The contestants need to be quick-witted, imaginative and nimble to produce a culinary delight in a race against the clock and their rivals.

Teamwork is normally key for success in any team contest, but that principle is turned on its head when the team members are unable to communicate with each other. That’s the unusual element which spices up this contest and demands more initiative from the time-pressured chefs.

FINISH THAT DISH

The secret of success is how well the first chefs are able to guide their partners by leaving pointers and clues, setting up and organizing the ingredients and utensils which their teammate will need to complete the dish. It will then be up to the second chef to understand this signs correctly and put the finishing touches to the plate.

To make their task tougher, the winning team will have to work their magic not just once but three times, with one of the four teams eliminated in each of the first two rounds. First is a 30-minute appetizer round and then a 40-minute entrée, before the final two teams battle it out in the 25-minute dessert round. While entertaining the viewers with their skill and charm, the four teams will of course have to win over the three judges with their culinary achievement. The judges, known for their ability to cook well with others, judge the plates based on their taste, presentation and creativity.

The stakes will be high for the four teams, who will be competing not just for the glory of beating their rivals but also for a winner-takes-all grand prize of $10,000.
